ABSTRACT	Since a couple of years, countries increased their efforts regarding the disaster preparedness and the emergency situations management. But measures taken by governments to include migrants, asylum seekers and refugees into those plans are really uncommon. As the migrants' social situation make them particularly vulnerable, we can consider that they are exposed to an additional risk in case of a disaster occurs. Unfortunately, executives tend to forget that those persons are even more exposed than the others. That's why it is crucial to take this multicultural dimension into account while realizing prevention plans. To do so, it is firstly important to analyse how countries face this vulnerability and then think about which actions we can implement to overcome it. The global objective of this conference was to boost initiatives that aimed at moving towards inclusive approaches to guarantee equal rights regarding the care in crisis situations and producing documents which take into account the cultural and intercultural sensibility.
